Stan Bahnsen

Stan Bahnsen ("The Bahnsen Burner") was named American League Rookie of the Year as a Yankee in 1968, when he won 17 games with a 2.06 ERA. With a record 19 lifetime victories against the Yankees biggest American League rival, Bahnsen was known as a Red Sox killer. He won 21 games with the Chicago White Sox in 1972 and has a total of 146 lifetime victories. Bahnsen pitched for division-winning teams while with the A's and Expos and is ranked 11th on the Yankees' all-time ERA leaders list. He averaged 15 wins as a starting pitcher for nine years before becoming a setup-man for Oakland and Montreal for the last six years of his career.

Randy Hundley

Signed in 1965 by the Chicago Cubs from the Giants, Randy Hundley caught nearly every Cub game 1966-69. In fact, he set a major league record with 160 games behind the plate (147 complete games) in 1968 and became the first player in ML history to catch 150 or more games for three consecutive years (1967-69). Hundley also won a Gold Glove in 1967, committing just four errors for a National League record and was named to the NL All-Star team in 1969. In addition to his stellar performance calling pitches, throwing with accuracy and hitting with power, Hundley popularized a new hinged glove that permitted a one-handed catching style. Hundley also played for the Twins and Padres and returned to the Cubs to finish his career in 1976-77.

Rudy May

A solid starter for the Angels, Orioles and Expos, May did two tours of duty with the Yankees. In fact, it was with the contending Yankees and Orioles teams that he gained the most attention. Purchased by New York in June 1974, May went 8-4 for the second-place team and finished the year with a 3.19 ERA. He was 14-12 in 1975 and the following June was sent to the Orioles, where he went 11-7 the rest of the season and 18-14 in 1977 (starting a total of 37 games) before being traded to the Expos. May returned to the Yankees in 1980 as a free agent and had his best year. Working as a starter and reliever, he led the league with a 2.46 ERA and went 15-5, second only in winning percentage behind Cy Young Award-winner Steve Stone. During his career, May was in the top 10 in shutouts three times, in the top 10 in strikeouts seven times and in the top 10 in fewest hits per nine innings pitched five times.
